

Introduction

This poster explores the relationship between personality and stage fear. It examines how stage fear varies across different personality types using bar charts. Additionally, it analyzes the impact of stage fear on social exhaustion.

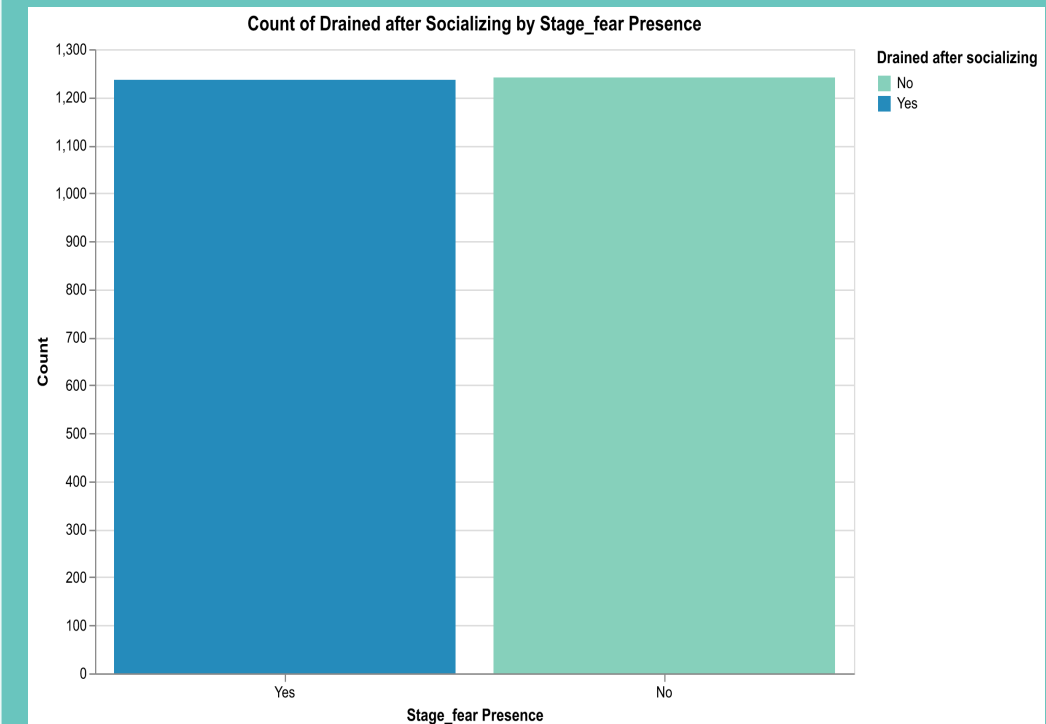

Does Personality Type Determine Who Experiences Stage Fear?

Introverts mostly report Stage Fear ("Yes" 1,127), while extroverts mostly report no Stage Fear ("No" 1,165).

Stage fear is common in Introverts (over 1,100) but rare in Extroverts (just above 100).

People with Stage_fear are more likely to feel drained after socializing, while those without Stage_fear are mostly not drained.

Conclusion

This poster shows stage fear varies with personality type. Introverts mostly report stage fear, while extroverts mostly do not. Stage fear is common in introverts but rare in extroverts. People with stage fear often feel drained after socializing, unlike those without stage fear. These findings indicate personality influences stage fear and its social impact. Understanding this relationship can help tailor support for individuals facing stage fear based on their personality traits.